

I was supposed to hate working for this impossible arrogant man.

Max Hartwood with his billion-dollar tech empire, zero patience, and the kind of gray eyes that could freeze hell.

I was supposed to be his temporary assistant in my small town after his company scandal forced a relocation.

Then a storm trapped us overnight in our crumbling Victorian office building. We stayed up all night. He let his CEO mask slip to reveal his true self.

Now I catch myself daydreaming of him. My body tingles every time I catch him looking at me. When we kiss, it feels like I've never truly been kissed before.

I'm completely, desperately, irrevocably in love with him.

But someone's been leaking company secrets to competitors, and every piece of evidence points straight to me. The board wants my head, the press is circling like sharks, and Max's entire empire is crumbling.

If I can't prove my innocence, I'll lose everything—including the man whose baby I'm carrying and who doesn't even know it yet
